The peak sanctuaries were some of the sacred places of the Minoan civilization. They are known as peak sanctuaries because they are located near or on the summit of mountains. They drew the boundaries between the divine and mundane and in the imaginary of the devotees they were a portal through which the divine presence would permeate the 1978). The most sacred are four mountain tops with ritual openings, sipapu, as thresholds for ancestral spirits. Although an isomorphism exists between the ceremonial subterranean chamber, kiva (the closest thing to temple architecture) and the landscape frame-work, the most effective locus of ritual power lies in the latter.
